THE SENTINELS'S POUCH.

It is not a very pleasant thing to be a sentinel, at the best of times; for there and agents at their respective post- is nothing very amusing in standing for offices, and a receipt from them for any several hours together, with a heavy money you wish to pay, is just as good as if given by us. But when it comes to standing sentry on a bitter January night, with a show er of cold sleet beating in your face and wetting you to the skin, no food since breaktast and no chance of supper, but a very good chance, indeed, of being shot by the skirmishers of an enemy encamped within half a mile, it really does begin to seem "rather too much of a good thing." So thought Private Wilhelm Baum of the Prussian army, as he stood peering watchfully into the darkness, from the heights of Bunzelwitz, and almost wishing that the Austrians and Russians, whose camp-fire he could see along the other side of the valley, would make an attack, and give him something else to do besides shivering and getting

But they didn't, and Baum, growing sulkier as he grew wetter, wished himself back in his snug little apple orchard, at the foot of the "Giant Mountains," where he used to be in bed every night before the village clock tolled ten, after 1 35pm before the village clock tolled ten, after 2:22am a good supper of brown bread and cab-1:35pm bage.

"If the king had to be out in a night of this sort," he growled, blowing hard upon his numbed fingers' "he'd soon be as sick of the war as I am!"

"And how do you know he hasn't?" broke in a strong, sharp voice close *Daily except Sundays. {Daily except Mou-nays. +Daily. beside him, while a shadowy figure rush up in front as suddenly as if it had shaped itself out of the darkness.

Instantly Baum was himself again. At the first sign of a stranger approaching his post, the soldier-spirit awoke at once, and sileaced his grupbling.

tiis musket was at his shoulder in a moment, and his voice rang out clear and stern : "Stand! Who goes there?"

"A friend," replied the unknown. "Advance, friend, and give the countersign."

"The Prussian Eagle." "Pass on, and all's well."

But, instead of passing on,the stranger came close up to the sentry, who could just make out, by a stray gleam of moonlight, that his mysterious visitor was wrapped in a horseman's cloak, and had a three-cornered hat slouched over his eyes in such a way as completely to hide

"You seem to have rather a damp quarters here, comrade," said he; why don't you have a smoke to warm vourself a bit?"

"smoke!" echoed the sentry; "why, where do you come from brother, not to know that smoking on duty "strictly forbidden ?"

"The king be hanged?" retorted the soldier, gruffly. "What would my Captain say? Long before the king could hear of it, the drummer's cane would make my back like a survey-map!"

"Pooh! the captain's not here to see you. Out with your pipe, man! I'll tell no tales!"

"Look here, you rascal?" eried the sentinel, fiercely. "I half suspect you're some fellow who has got a grudge against me, and wants to get me into trouble. Now, if that's so, you had better be off before worse comes of it; for if you worry me any more, I'll be apt to give you such a cuff on the head as you won't like.

"I'd like to see you try it," said the other, mockingly.

The soldier's only reply was a blow which, had it gone fairly home, would have blowed down the stranger like a

There was not much sleep for poor Baum that night, although he was reheved from guard half an hour later. The London Garden says that the use of red lead will effectually prevent mice and birds from devouring the seeds which have been sown in the garden. Peas and other seeds, coated with red lead, will repeal them. First wet the seeds, and then take them well with the powdered red lead, and they will not be interfered with. A better way is to moisten the seeds with turpentine before ceating them with the red lead. This has been found an effectual remedy against devourers of cabbage seed. brocols, turnips, radishes, etc. These small seeds adhere too much together if water is poured on them, and they are, therefore, moisten ed in a damp cloth before shaking with the red lead. This remedy is easily tested by those who are annoyed by mice, and its value determined.
